Abstract

identify the reasons for their failure to achieve the intended objectives. The study's findings emphasize that Islamic unity is crucial for the strength and cohesion of the ummah, as demonstrated by historical and religious examples such as the Constitution of Medina. It reveals that previous unity efforts, such as the Arab Cooperation Council and the Maghreb Union, often lacked real substance and focused more on political rather than doctrinal aspects. The research highlights that historical weaknesses in the ummah stemmed from conflicts and differences that undermined unity and collective action. The study asserts the need to effectively use the objectives of Islamic law to achieve genuine unity. It emphasizes renewing and developing unity initiatives to address current challenges. It calls for applying the objectives of Islamic law and creating effective, substantive unity institutions that surpass previous failed models, along with building trust and cooperation between Muslim countries through genuine alliances and initiatives. The current situation in Gaza has exposed the deficiencies within the ummah and underscores the necessity for truly effective unity to fulfill the aspirations of the nation. © 2025 Universiti Sultan Azlan Shah.
