8 1	Introduction	215
8 2	The Major Observations and Findings	217
8 2 1	The 'Class III' position of primary teachers in the civil service system mitigates against their recognition as members of a professionalized occupation	218
8 2 2	The dominant actor is the state and the power elites are not actively engaged in the mainstream primary education sub-sector, and hence in primary teachers	218
8 2 3	The teacher training system lacks the facilities to disseminate the knowledge and develop the competence that is required of an autonomous and effective group of practitioners	221
8 2 4	Fragmented and weak unions have tended to emphasise traditional trade union demands and failed to address the issue of teachers' vocational autonomy	223

8 2 5	Various groups of users pull GPS teachers in different directions and have not helped to improve their working conditions	224
8 2 6	International development partners' efforts to improve conditions in the primary sub-sector sometimes have a negative effect on the vocational standing of primary teachers	226
8 3	The Actor-based Framework for the Study of Occupations Revisited Theoretical Implications	227
