ISLAM, GLOBALIZATION AND PUBLIC SECTOR GOVERNANCE IN THE CONTEMPORARY ERA

SM Abdul Quddus

Globalization started sometime ago and it is an ongoing process. It is a multi-faceted phenomenon, which infiltrates into all areas of human life (Larry Ray, 2007). The usage of internet and other modern electronic media directly or indirectly has speed up the process of transporting modern globalization to the world community. Given that Islam has become a global phenomenon, it is increasingly important that its principles are respected and not made irrelevant in the modern world. "All religious people in any age have to make their traditions address the challenge of their particular modernity. Rather than provoking the bi-polarization of the world, separating Islamic values from Western values, the goal of globalization is to develop an understanding of each other's values and codes of ethics and to establish a common ground.

Since modern globalization is mainly coming from the West, one should intend to explore and investigate: in what ways Muslim conceptualization of globalization is different when compared to modern globalization, to look into some of the meanings given to modern globalization, the shifting aims of education, the marginalization of local culture and language, brain drain due to globalization, how should Muslims react to globalization and finally on the question, how public sector management should be reformed in line with the reality of globalization and Islamic philosophy of government and administration in the contemporary era?

However, following the example of the Western capitalist models and excluding religion public sector reform has produced varied reactions in MMCs. Such reactions include widespread social alienation and accelerated unhappiness and promotion of restless competition rather than cooperation. All these realities raise some unavoidable questions and debates that need to be properly addressed both from theoretical and practical perspectives. A refocused attention at the philosophy of public sector governance in light with the role of religion and globalized and technology-driven world is an important endeavor to undertake. Thus the main objective of this paper is to explore an administrative model for public sector governance that will fulfil the socio-economic, technological and spiritual needs of a society. Data for this paper will be collected mainly from secondary sources i.e. content analysis. 'Islamic administrative model' as suggested by Al-Bureay will be used as a theoretical underpinning of this study.
